Publisher

Dennis Publishing for UK and The Week Publications (USA)

Brief History

The Week was founded in the United Kingdom by Jolyon Connell (formerly of the right-of-centre Sunday Telegraph) in 1995. In April 2001, the magazine began publishing an American edition, an Australian edition followed in October 2008. The Week Publications publishes the US edition. In September 2007, the magazine's U.S. edition launched a daily website. In October 2015, the UK edition of The Week launched a free iPhone app called The WeekDay.

Scope and Coverage

The Week is a family of publications which began with a print magazine more than 20 years ago. It now also includes digital editions of the magazine, with weekly apps for iPads, iPhones and Android devices – and a website that publishes distinctive online stories throughout the week. The Week site provides an overview of the previous day's news. It provides the week's news and editorial commentary from global media to provide readers with multiple political viewpoints. In addition to news and opinion, this tool also covers science, business and the arts.

Kind of Information

The Week provides all types of news articles. In this tool articles are available with its title, date of publication, short description. Within the article sometimes photographs are present. Within article hyperlinked terms are present. An example is given below.

The truth about shark culling

Fresh calls have been made for a shark cull in Australia following the death of a teenage surfer, but some argue the controversial practice does little to protect human lives. What are the facts?

What happened in Australia?

Laeticia Brouwer, 17, was attacked by a shark on Monday while surfing with her father off the coast of Western Australia. It was the third shark-related fatality on the state's beaches in the past year.

Responding to the attack, federal environment minister Josh Frydenberg said the government would welcome "any proposal to put human life first", including a shark cull.

His comments came ahead of a pre-planned Senate committee hearing on shark attack mitigation strategies in Perth today.

Culls have been carried out in Western Australia in the past amid widespread protests. A controversial catch-and-kill programme using baited hooks was implemented after a spate of attacks in 2014, but was scrapped months later, reports Sky News. This was due to concerns about its ecological impact.

What do Australians think?

Supporters of a fresh cull include Fred Pawle, surf writer at The Australian. "Our insane shark-conservation policies have cost another life," he writes.
