Brief History

In 1852, the American Geographical Society began publishing its first academic journal, the Bulletin [and Journal] of the American Geographical Society. This publication continued through 1915, when it was succeeded by the Geographical Review. Notable contributors include Robert J. Flaherty, who introduced the concept for Nanook of the North in his contributions to Geographical Review, Mark Jefferson, who was the chief cartographer of the American Delegation to the Paris Peace Conference in 1919 and presented his article The Law of the Primate City in the 1939, as well as Dr. Martin Pasqualetti who in 2011 introduced his theory on Social Barriers to Renewable Energy Landscapes. The editor-in-chief is David H. Kaplan (Kent State University).

Scope and Coverage

The Geographical Review is a quarterly peer-reviewed academic journal published by Wiley-Blackwell on behalf of the American Geographical Society. It covers all aspects of geography. The "Geographical Record" section presents short articles on current topical and regional issues. Each issue also includes reviews of recent books, monographs, and atlases in geography and related fields.

Kind of Information

The Geographical Review includes Geography and Jurisdiction, several countries geographical descriptions, climate changes information, cultural tradition, urban infrastructure, vernacular architecture etc.

Reviews are presented with original article, authors/editors name, first published date, DOI number, cited by articles information, abstract, different tables, maps, figures, national and settlement population etc. Each review is arranged content-wise. Such as.....
